

Jennifer Roemhildt Tunehag

For over a decade, Jennifer Roemhildt Tunehag worked among women and men in prostitution and victims of human trafficking in Athens, Greece.

In Athens, Jennifer started the ministry Lost Coin (now Nea Zoi, or New Life). Over many years, Jennifer and her coworkers there visited streets and brothels to talk to and pray with exploited women. They served coffee and shared tears, offering hope in Christ and practical help. In 2008, Nea Zoi was recognised by the US State Department for its work among victims of human trafficking.

After turning the ministry over to new leadership, Jennifer began focusing on the challenge of engaging the global church in Christ's mission of individual restoration and societal transformation. She has received numerous international assignments to develop strategic partnerships and interventions, working in close cooperation with major Christian organisations, including:

- Advocates International
- European Evangelical Alliance
- International Christian Alliance on Prostitution
- Operation World
- World Evangelical Alliance

She now serves as an independent missions consultant working to catalyze the church in ministry around the world, a vision which includes serving on the Core Team of the European Freedom Network (EFN).

EFN works to connect national Evangelical Alliances with active and emerging ministries and other stakeholders in their context, and serves those networks by providing the tools they need for effective cooperation and action. Over 200 EFN partner organizations are now working across 41 countries in Europe (and beyond) to build a bridge to freedom for those who are exploited.

Jennifer was a co-facilitator for a global think tank group focusing on "Business as Mission (BAM) and Human Trafficking", which explored the potential of business to function for prevention and restoration in situations of human trafficking. The group is now pursuing development of a global Freedom Business Trade Association.

Jennifer lives with her husband, Mats, in Stockholm, Sweden (and other warmer places in winter!).
